THEIR NEED

The previous Judge Advocate General (JAG) building at the post was built in 1982 and was of poor construction quality from the start. Over the years, it became apparent that it was more cost effective to replace the deteriorated old building with a modern structure. The JAG office near Seattle serves the Washington National Guard. The client was also interested in establishing a unique new design aesthetic for the buildings at the site.

OUR SOLUTION

Needing a building that could be completed quickly and with minimal disruption to the daily operations of the base, Whitley-Evergreen of Marysville, Washington was selected to construct the office.

The 1,800 square foot building incorporated an exterior of brick wainscoting with a stucco-esque wall system surrounding large, anchored windows. A hip roof structure adds to the visual appeal. A host of modern telecommunications and security systems were installed to provide for the client's long-term needs.
